

Trump wins – What now for Canadian investors?

Luc de la Durantaye (LD)

*Managing Director,
Asset Allocation and Currency Management*

Jeffrey Waldman (JW)

First Vice President, Global Fixed Income

Stephen Carlin (SC)

Managing Director and Head, Equities

The verdict is in. With Donald Trump declared as the next American President, Canadian investors question what the next four years could bring. We asked some of our portfolio management experts to share their thoughts on what could shape their particular investment space.

An unwelcome surprise for markets

LD

Since financial markets had been favouring a Clinton win, this result is clearly a surprise, and is likely to negatively impact financial markets. Under Trump, fear of the U.S. adopting a more protectionist trade approach is likely to lead financial markets to price in slower economic growth and higher inflation. This could lead to a correction in equity markets and a rise in bond yields. A strong U.S. dollar is also likely on the back of declining trade partner currencies such as the Canadian dollar and the Mexican peso, which both stand to lose the most in a likely change in U.S. policy.

U.S. Economic fallout

JW

At the end of arguably the most farcical and sordid presidential campaign in American history, Donald Trump takes office with one of the lowest approval ratings ever for a new president. Thanks to the controversies surrounding him, there will be no honeymoon period when he enters the White House in January, like there was when Barack Obama took office in 2009.

On the economy, Trump will try to impose fewer regulations in the energy sector and the banking sector by rolling back Dodd-Frank¹ but reinstating Glass-Steagall², a higher minimum wage, lower taxes on businesses and individuals, and new terms for trade deals that currently exist.

Perhaps some of these measures will help jumpstart an economy that has been growing at less than 2%, but not likely to the lofty levels that Trump is suggesting. There is a risk that trade frictions could actually trigger a backlash and slow economic growth.

Repercussions of stance on Mexico, China & U.S. Fed

LD

Potentially, one of the biggest financial market consequences could result from Trump's stance on Mexico and China. He has expressed a strong protectionist position, and has suggested introducing tariffs and duties, particularly on China, as well as renegotiating free-trade agreements with Mexico and Canada. He has also threatened to label China as a currency manipulator. This could all worsen trade relations with China.

As well, under Trump's presidency, we will have to watch how much fiscal spending is increased, which could spur growth, and therefore steepen the yield curve. Trump has been very critical of the U.S. Federal Reserve (Fed) and how they are not meeting standards. If he decides to have it audited, and force changes at the Fed, this may also unnerve markets about the uncertain future of U.S. monetary policy direction and leadership.

Impact on Canada

SC

The Trump victory raises more questions than answers. Uncertainty about the future equates to a higher level of volatility. We expect that the market will initially react negatively to this outcome. The outcome of initiatives like potentially re-negotiating the North American Free Trade Agreement would have a potential negative impact for the Canadian economy. However, we note that most of the rhetoric on trade agreements related to lost jobs in America. It would be our expectation that Mexico could be more in the crosshairs of these discussions than Canada.

The Canadian stock market will not be immune to the U.S. market reaction—especially given that we remain strong trading partners. The Canadian government and the Bank of Canada will stand ready with a policy response to bridge a potential impact as a result of uncertainty. We see concern around many government policies translating into a higher level of market volatility until a clearer picture emerges. Trump has also conveyed a view relating to current Fed policy—this remains an important risk element not just for Canada, but for all global central banks and markets to absorb.

Bond market impact – winners and losers

JW

The bond market was reasonably priced going into the election, so now the markets will adjust to the outcome. The additional entitlement, defense, and infrastructure spending, if enacted, would likely ultimately increase U.S. Treasury bond issuance. This higher issuance would tend to cause longer-term yields to rise more than shorter-term yields since the Fed has been adjusting monetary policy at a very slow pace. And the shape of the yield curve would likely steepen. Congressional gridlock would be a better outcome from the standpoint of the bond market, as there would be fewer forces at play to increase yields.

Some sectors of the corporate bond market will likely do better than others. For example, the oil and gas sector will likely outperform alternative energy sectors such as wind and solar. The banking and healthcare sectors will face uncertainty due to changing regulations. Construction and defense contractors should benefit from more spending. Greater protectionism will hurt exporters, but the extent will depend on whether other countries retaliate.

Strategic portfolio shifts

LD

Overall, we continue to advise a more balanced approach to clients' portfolios until some of these uncertainties can be clarified. We recently marginally reduced our exposure to equity markets in general and the U.S. market in particular. This strategic shift represented our assessment that equity markets were becoming expensive. In addition, economic and political uncertainty, not only in the U.S. but also in Europe following the Brexit outcome, was growing at a time when central bank policymakers were running out of policy tools.

What could impact markets next?

JW

Janet Yellen's position as Fed Chair looks tenuous with Trump. So a new element of uncertainty has been introduced for investors with the election results. But once the fireworks from this surprise outcome are over, the market attention shifts to the Fed meeting and the Italian referendum in December, which could generate additional market volatility. Fasten your seatbelts; we could be in for some turbulence.

¹The Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act is U.S. federal law that places regulation of the financial industry in the hands of government.

²Glass-Steagall is a U.S. banking act that prohibits commercial banks from engaging in the investment business.

The views expressed in this document are the personal views of Vincent Lépine, Stephen Carlin, Patrick O'Toole, and Scott Vali and should not be taken as the views of CIBC Asset Management Inc. This document is provided for general informational purposes only and does not constitute financial, investment, tax, legal or accounting advice nor does it constitute an offer or solicitation to buy or sell any securities referred to. Individual circumstances and current events are critical to sound investment planning; anyone wishing to act on this document should consult with his or her advisor. The information contained in this document has been obtained from sources believed to be reliable and is believed to be accurate at the time of publishing, but we do not represent that it is accurate or complete and it should not be relied upon as such. All opinions and estimates expressed in this document are as of the date of publication unless otherwise indicated, and are subject to change. ©CIBC Asset Management and the CIBC logo are registered trademarks of Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC). The material and/or its contents may not be reproduced without the express written consent of CIBC Asset Management Inc.